How completely the soil of Lower Burmah is devoted to the cultivation of rice (says a Singapore contemporary) may be gathered from the fact that, of the cultivated area of the province, estimated at 4,600,000 acres, about 3,700,000 acres pre estimated to be under rice. The export of this commodity from Burmak is reckonquantity which places the province easily in the first rank among rice experting countries. Bengal takes second place, but at a remote distance, her export of rice amounting annually to about three hundred thousand tons. Then follow Saigon, Siam, Java, and the Philippine islands. It may be that so far Burmah can with some case hold her own against competitors, but Indian and Burman rice have now by no means a monopolyof the market as they once might with more truth have claimed: Command of a monopoly I may justify an export duty, but when the monopoly has obviously ceased to exist, and encreachments apon it are steadily onlarging, the retention of a duty becomes indefensible. The Chinese Government in assuming this telerant attitude are doubtless influenced by the desire to get rid of Franch interference with their domestic affairs; but, at the same time, they have been encouraged to take up their present position by the discreet, judicious, law-abiding olicy of Protestant missionaries. > An aged veteran who had fought at Quatre Bras and Waterloo was one day visited by the master of an adjacent grammar-school in company with several of his pupils. The master, after having narrated to his scholars the events which led up to the campaign, closely questioned the old soldier regarding his share in these great conflicts. He then thanked the veteran, and was turning to go, when the ancient warrior remarked, "Oh, but there is another thing that I mind! _" Indeed_what is that?" asked the dominie expecting to hear an additional reminiscence. "I weel mind that I was jist as thirsty a' the time o' the battle as I am the neo!" The schoolmaster took the hint.

> As the gilded youth of Pavis has shown an increasing tendency of late towards the wearing of bangles and bracelets, a discussion has been raised to decide, if possible, how far their effeminate oustom can be justified by notable example. It is, of course, pleaded in favour of the custom that the Duke of Edinburgh is a persistent wearer of one or more of these ports-honeur bracelets. As the King of Greece also affects a similar fashion, it is inferred that the influence of their wives, who are both Russian ladies, may have something to do with their adoption of this silly habit. Let welling houses were more or less d-corated and us hope, that even the example of a reigning sovereign will not suffice to make such an absurd custom general.

The Shah of Persia has very nearly come to grief in endeavouring to prove his prowess as a Nimrof. A few weeks ago, whilst engaged in a grand bear-huntin the district of Toschan-Tepch, two bears, evidently possessed by neither a due sense of respect for the Shah nor of the rules of the Royal Hunt Game, simultaneously attacked Nassred-Din. His Imperial Highness. thus taken on either flank, would have inevitably succumbed to the attack but for the plucky interference of an attendant, who rushed successfully to the resone. With the lavish generosity of an Eastern potentate the Shah promptly made his resouer governor of a province, which, let us hope, will not prove, as too often is the case in Persia, a short out to the bow-string.

A Lover's Predicament.—A curious incident happened at Milan not long since. In a family of weavers are two beautiful twin sisters, so exactly alike that only their most intimate acquaintances can distinguish between them. A young cabinetmaker courted, as he supposed, one girl but made love to both without knowing it, and the girls kept each her secret. One day recently the cabinetmaker visited the mother and asked the hand of her daughter in marriage. The mother called the girls, and, for the first time, he saw them both together, and when asked which of her daughters he sought to make his companion he was completely nonplused, and could not tell "tother from which." He did not know how to decide, and, as each girl averred that it was she whom he had courted, he asked time to consider which he would take.
